Still more gratifying was the announcement that the South Western Company would always be to the fore in providing the necessary depth of water for the deepest vessels that science could build, and it was only natural that he should point out the duties of the local authorities to maintain a sufficient depth in the channel to enable the ships to come to the docks. There has always been deeper water in the channel than there is to be found at the quays, and, with co-operation on the part of the dock owners and the local authorities, there should be absolutely no difficulty or misunderstanding...
