Women have generally intercourse with a man only after two years, because they are convinced if they become pregnant again before the children can eat native food they will die. A mother is not regarded as unclean, but after the delivery her husband often refuses to eat food made by her because of the blood which might get therein. Before being readmitted to society, i.e., after three days if it is a male child, and four days a female child, there is a small ceremony. The leaves of a plant called by the natives kmaghla are taken and boiled. When the extract is tepid, they pour it on the mother's head. She can then go out of the compound. During the pregnancy of his wife a man must not perform work considered unclean. For instance, he must not help bury the dead. The smell...
